

BEING A DEVOTEE, WE MUST ASSUME IT EVERY DAY!

I am a member on the site paradevo.net. Go check it out if you are devotee, or disabled seeking devotee.

In the article that follows, you will be able to read about various devotee. They tell small snippets of their lives. You will understand that being devotee, it can be enjoyable, or embarrassing, but mostly it is lived every day!

"Here's a little story that happened the other day ... I was in one of his stores. I spotted a man in a chair in the row of cash registers, he was with his wife, but it did not matter to me. I rush out to buy pastries because I wanted to see. So I put in the line next to them and I actually could see the face ... quite a few have to say. But I still wanted to see them outside. My God, I'm a stalker. LOL. Once outside, I saw the truck and they are headed. And here: I saw him out of his chair to climb into the truck, then his girlfriend fold the chair and put it in the trunk.

And I realized once again that YES, I really am a devotee. Sometimes I think it's just in my head. But no, I loved seeing the transfer in his truck, I envied his wife and I enjoyed this picture in my head all day. So for me it was a good day! Is this crazy or what to have such a shot in the ass about a subject that is irrelevant for others. "

"Yesterday I was waiting for my friend when I spotted a guy on crutches. I could not take my eyes off him for even a second. Until my friend tapped me on the shoulder and led me back to reality. "

"It's the same for me, I usually do the opposite of what is common. In the end, if I see a cute guy to the bathroom, my mind freezes and I get nervous. If ever he goes before me and I'll do something stupid. I'll just do the opposite of what I should be sorry and the rest of the day There was a guy in the building where I worked last year. It was kind a cute. I saw him and came across him in the elevator a few times. He looked at me and once said "Hello" and I did that smile, the words would not come out. I was freezing. So I tried to avoid it as much as I could. I want to take a lift and if I see him, do the opposite. I know I'm pathetic. I get into a panic mode when there is someone I do not know. "

"People are generally not uncomfortable on any appeal they have, which is why some people behave so badly. Not all, of course, but most guys do not spend much time examining their feelings, especially when it comes to sex. Women are not supposed to think or initiate sex. Have these cravings is not typical of what the good girls. More disabled people are not "supposed" to have sex. So it's a taboo double, that's where the fear and shame come.

Just let yourself go, and embrace your sexuality. Foreigners are not chosen randomly, mind you. The only people who might notice are those which are very close to you, but you may want to let them know anyway, it's very liberating. There is no need to flee. As long as you behave like an adult friendly (ie no shots of crazy stalker), most guys like a friendly smile or a compliment. "

And what a great way to show you that feelings of devotee, it may surprise you right in the supermarket, just like when you wait for your spouse. Yet even if we understand why we feel this sensation, it does not help us to admit openly. Love, Disability, Gender, and are incompatible things in our society. Devotees us, we fight every day to understand a feeling with which we were born, a feeling not unlike the love of "normal". Require just one more love: love of disability!
